Agenda 21 Exposed - part five

Changes in building regulations in California which reduce the number of properties allowed per acre is another expression of Agenda 21, but before these megacities can become a reality the people in rural regions have to be removed from the land.

This is being done in many ways, all of them connected to making life impossible for rural communities. Thousands of rural and forest roads are being closed and campaigners estimate that at least a thousand dams have been dismantled to make farming and growing impossible.

There are rural ghost towns across America which once survived as food and drink stops for freeway traffic that are now destroyed since the authorities removed the freeway exits on which they depended. New exits have been introduced instead away from rural communities which are supplied by the corporations behind McDonalds, Burger King and all the other purveyors of 'nutrition'.

Officials are turning up in rural communities and offering insultingly low prices for their properties on designated no-people locations. If the homeowner or farmer and grower does not accept the price, or doesn't want to leave at any price, they are taken to court to have their property seized and then sent the bill for legal and court costs.

Rosa Koire is author of Behind the Green Mask: U.N. Agenda 21 and co-founder of the Santa Rosa Neighborhood Coalition and the Post Sustainability Institute.

Rosa describes how Agenda 21 is driving people from the land by the authorities refusing to pave rural roads and pulverising most of those that are.

She says that in Sonoma County (which includes the elite 'playground' at Bohemian Grove) in northern California the authorities have announced that only 150 out of 1,380 miles of rural road are going to be left paved and the rest pulverised to gravel. The excuse is a lack of money - another benefit of the engineered economic crash.

The consequences are that people are not able to get to and from their rural homes, property prices collapse and they are forced into the cities where they can be kept under 24/7 surveillance - precisely the plan of Agenda 21. Paved roads are among a long list of human activities that are considered 'unsustainable' and must be largely eliminated.

Post offices and bank branches are being closed or reduced in hours in rural areas as they are in other countries like Britain. The plan is to make rural life so unsustainable (ironically) that people will have to head for the cities.

As this happens the pressure on places to live will be used to justify the Bloomberg-like human rabbit-hutches of Agenda 21.

This engineered trend can be seen in the number of young people - the life blood of tomorrow's rural communities - that are leaving rural America for the cities and urban sprawls.

Kenneth Johnston of the Daily Yonder, an online newspaper for rural communities, wrote:

... in some parts of rural America, deaths have exceeded births for decades. This point was illustrated recently by a rural Kansas minister who said that he officiates at four funerals for every baptism. The growing incidence of natural decrease in rural America has gone largely unnoticed, yet natural decrease is no longer an isolated phenomenon occurring in a few remote corners of rural America.

Last year, 24 per cent of all U.S. counties experienced natural decrease. And, for the first time in U.S. history, deaths now exceed births in an entire state. Between 2000 and 2009, more people in West Virginia died than were born.

But 'natural decrease' is not fast enough for Agenda 21. Rural communities and farms are being mercilessly targeted by an ever-mounting deluge of laws and regulation from the bloodline-owned, corporation-controlled Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and Food and Drug Administration (FDA) purely aimed at making rural lives and businesses impossible. The same is happening in other countries including Britain.
